Murder in West Park.

Guitar in hand, David crossed the noisy London road and went into West Park. It was the afternoon of a perfect August day. The sky was blue, the sun was hot and David felt happy. The rehearsal¹ with the band had been good. Jon and Pete, the other members of the group, had played well. Now, they wanted to find a good singer, put their songs on YouTube and find a manager who could help them to become famous.

There was no one in the middle of the park and the noise of the cars had disappeared. David turned left by the fountain, and suddenly saw something on the path² in front of him. His heart stopped beating: it was a body. The body of a man ... and the man was dead. Was he dead? David's experience of dead men was limited; in fact, in the sixteen years of his life, he'd never seen one before.

He looked around him and saw a jogger, dressed in a blue T-shirt and shorts, at the end of the path.

"Help! I need help!" shouted David, but the jogger was listening to his iPod. He threw some rubbish in a litter bin, but didn't turn round.

David had seen a good number of detective series on television and he knew that he mustn't move the body. However, he felt the man's neck. It was warm, but there was no pulse³. He took his cell-phone from his pocket and called the police.

Almost immediately, he heard the sirens of the police cars. Good, he thought, the police are coming, and I can go home and play my guitar before the next rehearsal.

Contrary to David, Inspector Clark had seen a certain number of dead people during her fifteen years' service with the London police. When she arrived in the park with her colleague, Sergeant Williams; she knew immediately that this was a murder inquiry⁴.

She looked kindly at David and took a notebook and pen from her pocket.

"I have to ask you some questions," she said.
